INTRODUCTION

As Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, Burke Marshall had more day-to-day responsibility for civil rights than anyone in the Kennedy administration. In addition to being in charge of the Justice Department division that was on the front-line of law enforcement in civil rights, Marshall was directly involved in managing the various crises that occurred in the racial area, including the Freedom Rides, the desegregation of the Universities of Mississippi and Alabama, and the Birmingham protests in the spring of 1963. As an adviser to President Kennedy and Attorney General Robert Kennedy, he contributed significantly to the development of the broad civil rights bill that the administration proposed in 1963, and he was then involved in the struggle for enactment.

Few observers of the civil rights scene in 1960 would have guessed just how important a figure Marshall would become, for he was largely unknown to them initially. Clarence Mitchell, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People's highly experienced and astute Washington lobbyist, in addressing the NAACP board, characterized Marshall's appointment as "perhaps the most enigmatic move of the new administration." Although Mitchell had heard that Marshall favored protecting civil rights, there was "nothing in his public record to show" that he had "any firsthand knowledge of the problem."

Indeed, the lack of public record on civil rights and Marshall's absence from the field of advocacy help explain why Robert Kennedy appointed him Assistant Attorney General. Marshall's low profile on civil rights made confirmation by the Southern-dominated Senate Judiciary Committee much easier. Moreover, Kennedy wanted a tough and objective lawyer in that job, not a crusader or special-pleader. Thirty-eight years old at the time of his appointment, Marshall was a graduate of Yale Law School and a partner in the prestigious Washington law firm of Covington and Burling, where he specialized in antitrust work. He was interested in civil rights, however, had done some teaching in that area and had contributed, behind the scenes, to the development of the voting referee plan that Congress had approved in the 1960 Civil Rights Act.

Interestingly, Robert Kennedy almost did not appoint Marshall, whom he had never met before interviewing him for the job. Marshall, like Kennedy, was shy and reticent and after the interview Kennedy wondered whether he would be able to communicate with Marshall. Byron White, who was going to be Deputy Attorney General and later a Supreme Court Justice, persuaded Kennedy to hire him. Robert Kennedy, his biographer, Arthur Schlesinger later wrote, "was quickly impressed by the self-effacing Marshall's precise mind, incorruptible character, dry humor and intense moral conviction. There was no one on whose judgement he relied more during the rest of his life."

Because legislative prospects for civil rights looked bleak at the start of his administration, President Kennedy stressed executive action as an alternative approach. One of the most promising areas for such action was voting rights enforcement. Congress had recently enacted legislation in that area, but it had not been fully utilized to date. In addition, the franchise seemed to hold out the hope of laying a foundation for the establishment of other rights. Marshall, therefore, mobilized the forty lawyers in his division, got additional help from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and dramatically increased voting rights investigations and enforcement. With his encouragement, a large non-partisan voter registration effort, the Voter Education Project, was launched in the South.

These efforts are well documented in Marshall's papers, and so are the frustrations and disappointments that accompanied them. Alongside the successes, there were some glaring failures as federal district judges, some of them appointed by Kennedy, proved less than diligent about securing voting rights. Meanwhile, voting rights workers were sometimes victims of violence at the hands of vigilantes and local officials. Increasingly, these victims looked to the Justice Department to provide them with police protection. Marshall repeatedly responded, however, that Washington's ability to intervene in local law enforcement matters was restricted by law, especially by the doctrine and practice of federalism. (In 1964 Marshall expanded on his views in a book, Federalism and Civil Rights.) The victims of violence were generally not persuaded by such reasoning. Federal protection marked the area of greatest strain between the administration and the civil rights movement.

Marshall's papers shed a good deal of light on this strained area. His papers also illuminate many other important civil rights developments and events. These include school desegregation cases, the desegregation of the Universities of Mississippi and Alabama, the Birmingham crisis, the development of the 1963 Civil Rights Bill, and administration efforts to achieve equal employment opportunity. Finally, his papers are informative about relationships between the administration and civil rights organizations and advocates, including the Civil Rights Commission, the Voter Education Project, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and Martin Luther King, Jr.

REEL INDEX

The frame number on the left hand side of the page identifies where a specific folder begins. These folders are typically a chronological grouping of documents from the Justice Department and from various Executive departments, Congress, and private individuals and organizations. In the interest of accessing material within the various correspondence files (Reels 1–8), this index begins by denoting the major substantive issues, reports, key policy formulations, and primary persons involved in the civil rights issue, within each folder. After Reel 8, Frame 0322, this index lists only the folders. This is due to their more specific titles and subject matter.
