

Introducing LexisNexis® Total Search v. 3.0

Now, your researchers can uncover relevant work product buried in the firm's internal document collections as easily and precisely as they search the LexisNexis® services.

New enhancements allow powerful searching within your firm's internal documents

Pinpoint searching for the most relevant results

Version 3.0 of LexisNexis Total Search lets you add proximity connectors while searching your internal documents, e.g., amend! W/10 pleading OR complaint. LexisNexis Total Search uses the precision of LexisNexis searching within your firm's internal document collections.

LexisNexis Total Search now also enables you to enter a case or statute citation in combination with search terms. LexisNexis Total Search will then search only for internal documents that contain the citation, as well as parallel and alternative citations, along with the search terms. For example if you were looking for documents that referenced both 30 U.S. 1 and "domestic dependent nation" you could enter both the terms and the citation and retrieve only documents that contain both the cite and the keywords.

Refine your results using descriptive data about the documents you retrieve

Only LexisNexis Total Search allows you to further refine your internal document results based on the metadata contained in your internal document collections, such as type of practice area, author, date written, client, matter, office, etc.

For example, say you're practicing in California and you only want internal documents created by your firm's San Francisco office, you can limit the answer set to only those documents. There is no need to sort through every document satisfying your search term, instead you can focus on those that are relevant to your research or drafting task. This revolutionary sorting tool will provide you with on-point materials with the simple check of a box.

Similarly, if you are interested in finding only documents on a particular topic that were written by a specific attorney, you can refine your results accordingly.

Choose from a single or multiple document collections

You probably have multiple offices across the country possibly even worldwide. Each location has its own internal document collections, and in some cases, those created for individual practice areas. LexisNexis Total Search now allows as many discrete document collections as your firm needs. You can now choose amongst these collections to search for only those documents that will be relevant to your need. This helps you to focus on only that content that will be relevant to your task.

Administrators can now monitor attorney adoption rates

LexisNexis Total Search now allows administrators to pull activity reports showing who is using the system and what has been retrieved. These reports provide tangible justification for the use and indispensability of LexisNexis Total Search. And, now, it's easier to prove how valuable the product is to the firm by demonstrating widespread use.

At the same time, the reports can help you identify "soft spots" for usage. For example, if IP litigators aren't taking full advantage of the product, you can request additional training for the firm's IP attorneys, maximizing the firm's investment in advanced technologies.
