Regulatory documents

Regulatory documents are those issued by government entities that are non-rule making but provide a complete picture and give additional guidance to regulations.

Why are they important?

You're already tracking the regulations that affect your industry, but do you have the whole picture? Every state produces regulatory documents that provide additional guidance to the published regulations. Regulations that change constantly.

- In the insurance industry, you need to understand the changing reporting requirements in order to stay compliant, remain licensed and avoid penalties.
- Being able to track notices of available property and where to file a claim are important to those in the real estate industry that restore or repurpose abandoned property.
- Regulatory notices provide grant availability to philanthropic organizations.

Instead of going state to state and agency to agency to find all pertinent regulatory documentation, the State Net® service provides a complete picture.

Regulatory documents come in many forms, but the main types of documents include:

- Advisory Opinions and Letters
- Announcements
- Bulletins
- Circular & Informational Letters
- Disciplinary Orders
- Guidance Documents
- Memorandum
- Notices including but not limited to General Interest and Public Hearings
- Orders
- Statements of Policy

Discovery tools:

- One-click access to proposed and adopted regulations
- Full-text, topic and "smart" searching
- State Net private tracking file
- Links to hearings and revisions of rules
- Agency comment deadlines

State Net collects over 600 types of documents throughout all 50 states, collected from over 13,000 regulatory sources including state departments of insurance, state boards of pharmacy, various agencies at the state and federal levels that includes the Federal Register, providing over 52,000 documents.
